Adventures on Czech railways today. Bit of sightseeing in Dečín this morning, including meeting Vladimir (photo) who showed us round the very moving reconstructed synagogue - and also showed us the medals he had won in international javelin competitions. Then to Prague by old-fashioned corridor train with bikes in the luggage van, which was easy enough once we worked it out. Prague metro with bikes interesting but probably less stressful than cycling through rush hour traffic over tramlines and cobbles. This evening's entertainment involved a pantomime in the chemist's shop since we can't say 'please' in Czech, let alone 'knee' or 'support'. In spite of this, Bruce now has leg assistance. We then tried to book rail tickets for tomorrow to get us somewhere close to the Czech border so we could carry on to Vienna in easier stages, but no luck. The words 'rail replacement bus service' seem to spread chaos in any language. Thanks to the sterling efforts of a very enterprising assistant in the main railway ticket office, we are going by train tomorrow morning to Olbramovice and we will see how Bruce's knee holds up after 20 miles or so by bike to Tabor. Another train booked to take us on to Ceske Budejovice tomorrow evening and then we will have to work out a new plan from there. — with Bruce Ryan at Praha.
